

Cover Art: Spiraling out of Control, by Isabella Ronchetti

Blue Marble Review

Summer 2017

Poems

The Art of the Black Woman By Kalijah Rahming being a black child living in America is an extremely difficult task

we are forced to deal with all the standards and stereotypes that have been placed upon us for generations we are the children who must bear the burden of our ancestors

we are also victims of racism, discrimination, and oppression black women, specifically, have been lied to for generations ever since we were children, we were fed our daily meal of lies by a society that does not care for us we are told that our skin is too dark, that we are too curvy, that our bodies do not match the molds created by European standards people tell us that we are “pretty for a black girl” or “pretty for a dark skinned girl” although these may seem as though they are compliments, the underlying truth is that they are saying that people of African descent are not beautiful

OR if we are beautiful, it is only when we are light skinned why is white the only standard of beauty out there?

there are many variations of black people and black beauty out there in the world

it makes no sense that the only ones who are respected by society are those who are lighter and have features like those of Europeans what makes black not beautiful?

to me, black women, like my mother, exhibit strength and confidence and do not let any obstacle get in their way.

i wish to be like them they are my true inspirations to me, black is not the color of darkness and hatred but instead the color of beauty, hope, and freedom

Kalijah is a tenth grader from California who identifies as a self-proclaimed chai tea enthusiast. It does not seem possible to her that people are able to get through a week without at least three cups of the stuff. She is a vivacious reader and does not think herself safe and content unless she is in the middle of at least fifteen books at the same time. In addition to this, she is also a feminist and a supporter of the Black Lives Matter movement.

African Plain By Cindy Song

I do not love you—your ringing laugh or your big hair which holds a thousand surprises. I do not miss those times—those stupid wonderful times when we talked about swollen knees and shot birds in the back of my dusty little garage shop. How could I have known that my little garage still had room for you, whom I do not love of course.

I wish the gears of my feelings worked simple like the ones in cars.

I am a mechanic not a poet.

I do not love

not loving you, not having the words to say what my lips bleed to say. Fear my heart will be hammered open—shattered—like the cases you so cleverly solve, like the ghosts of a slashed mattress.

How I long to sing the bitter notes of your past into a sweeter melody but people can't be fixed as easily as cars.

My love for you is a mystery only for you to solve.

It's not like your other mysteries. It's plain like the tall African grass that smells like bush tea and whispers hints so loud. No longer will I be caged in denial like a lion roaming the plaster white walls of his stubborn pride:

I do love you—

even more than the infinite expanse of the Kalahari, the swaying olive trees of my beloved homeland.

Cindy Song is sixteen years old and a junior at Richard Montgomery High School in Rockville, Maryland. Besides writing poetry and prose, she also enjoys playing tennis, drawing, and taking long walks in nature.

Like Planting By Lucas Grasha

A writer writes to rip a hole in a floor.
To find a bloom in a blight.

Because a poem startles the night to puncture safety and its borders. It pours into your dormant, furrowed brain to rewrite patterns walked into the ground. Might—vacant crucible —is like every board rebuffing new blooms (the freight of everything) and is exhumed. The tight floor is safe and dying. Hoarded seeds in the mind's cabinet ripen like sediment. The writer rights pestilent fallowness. Then: words that abuse vacant troughs with light and uprooting hands which fight with manic pain to erase borders from the mind's geography. At night, the poem startles with fruitful blight.

Lucas Grasha currently studies poetry and German at the University of Pittsburgh. In his spare time, he reads books from his eclectic library with his wife. He proudly calls Pittsburgh his home.

happy to be here By Alixa Brobbey in the almost broken black car we are turning from Zaire street onto Lilongwe avenue.

dad complains about the car and the weather, and the doctors, i am too excited to say anything inside my soul is singing, for no reason, except i am happy to be here yes, i see that paint is peeling off of buildings we pass like teardrops slowly falling from the sky

but next to this slow death, there are pink flowers peeking out from the cracks in the walls and because of that small beauty

i am happy to be here and yes, sometimes the sun scorches my skin so i look more burned marshmallow than delicious chocolate, but here the boys don't see me as beautiful like an exotic flower, but beautiful like their own resilient mothers, and that comparison makes me happy to be here and yes, i don't like how some want to see me but not hear me throw my voice over the rooftops, and yes i don't like potholes and dumsor because it's scary getting lost in dark holes, and yes i don't like the fact that when adults greet us we reply like a scripted Greek chorus i am fine

i want to say that i am eons away from fine because i am so happy to be here and it may sound cliché or like forced poetry but when i think of my mother's ancestors hauled across the dark blue sea, i think that a few hours of silence just to pacify the spirits of the elders are worth a life out of chains, where i can walk where i please history makes me happy just to be Alix Brobbey is a young writer living in Accra, Ghana. She grew up in the Netherlands and often uses the experience of calling two different continents home as an inspiration for her work, which has been published in Canvas, The Battering Ram, and others. Aside from reading and writing, her hobbies include running, acting, trying to retain her fluency in Dutch, listening to Shawn Mendes' albums on repeat, and fangirling over Harry Potter. You can read more of her work here: <http://lilaccheetah.wixsite.com/alixawrites>

Langston Hughes By Marisa Moran

How do you get your words

To sing jazz

And taste like chocolate?

How do you get them

To breathe fire like a dragon

And yet fill the room

With a honey-scented voice

That paints ripples of light and dark

Across the walls?

How is it

That you can coax them

To fall in love

And persuade them

To dance together

Across the page

Eternally?

Marisa Moran is a junior in high school. In her free time she enjoys reading, writing, and participating in her high school's theatre department.

Broken By Denise Rogozin

Put some lipstick on.

Get some blush, you've lost color in your face.

Oh my, is that a mustache?

Laser it away.

God forbid your legs are prickly.

You could fill a C

Just add toilet paper

I'll show you.

.
. .
. .
. .
. .
. .
. .

How many times have you gone to the gym this week?

Eat more, you'll bulk up faster.

Hey baby, wanna come home with me tonight?

She's probably just on her period,

That's why she ain't feelin' me.

Come on, you're late for practice.

Are you done?

Can I come in?

Oh heavens.

What is that?

.
. .
. .
. .

Open up

Son, I've started the car.

Oh my god

What are you wearing?

What is around your chest?

Put down the scissors.

Put them down.

I swear to God, not one more snip.

.
. .
. .
. .
. .

Whose bra is that?

I'm calling your mother.

And the silk robe too,

And the lipstick

What did I do to deserve this?

Your curls

Your beautiful long curls

I'm booking a hair appointment,

We can fix this.

.
. .
. .

Alright, give everything to me

It's fine, no one has to know

We can fix this.

Denise Rogozin is seventeen years old. She has always loved writing, whether it was her unintentional re-creations of the Harry Potter series in middle school, or spoken word poetry about gang violence during her sophomore year of high school. She loves being able to share her thoughts in a different kind of way with poetry, and hopes to share some now through one of her favorites.

Dream Land By Hanna Iruka Hall

The sky is the color of a rusty crayon, the house a black box with a triangle on top. In the attic, a boy sleeps on a bed of broken sheets, a bar of light across his body.

The dark in his room is friendly as erasers. Grinning pencils are leaning in the closet, the shadow of a stuffed monkey claps his hands. The laundry basket rolls around laughing. And the room simplifies. A wall becomes a line, a chair a friendship. A belt buckle disappears. Above him is a shadow of a giant pair of hands, tousling his feather hair, and the boy's stick arms are crooked, elbows bent, as if he is cradling a bird.

Hanna Iruka Hall is eighteen years old and loves to read and write. Her work is forthcoming in Eunoia Review and has been recognized by Scholastic Art and Writing Awards. She is fascinated by Medusa from Greek mythology, and would like to conduct a slime-mold experiment in her free time.

gutter song By Rebecca Flieder mad adam east of eden makes up his own rules

to a game he does not play.
he will make her the burnished sandalwood tree of life and she will take the apple she will take the fruit the snake decides swallow the body the blood of the etz chayim the mates for life

back alley blackwater lilith.
a hot black tar tangerine jumpsuit and smiles–no
grins–no sneers at the pavement melting between her teeth.
the concrete forest the polluted cosmopolitan politico cold, calculated, chaotic greens and greys reflected in her eight-ball eyes.

her mother was a forest fire:
ardent, searing.
her father a gutter song of half-spent cigarettes and sweltering workday's grime waiting to be burned

lilith:
cuts her teeth on a road just laid down hot black tar between molars grinding his pavement punches down through the atmospheric smog splinter infested sidewalk rollerblading from his lips sits a cigarette rolled from the very jet black she walks on and she: like her mother will not submit.

mad adam makes up his own rules
to a game he does not play.

in kind:
she will tear herself out of him stop the traffic in his heartbeat cause a collision and slip away lilith will play his game play him like the devil's fiddle twirl him around her little finger like a snake around an apple tree lilith: coffee-candied lips and a sweet as saffron smile she will not play she will win bring eden to its winter

she will not merely survive his game lilith: the screech-owl the night-hag
the monster
the black tarred and feathered abomination
she will not merely survive his game

she will tear it to pieces and kill it with her beak she is everything he cannot be and more she: like he mother
will not submit.

she will burn every inch of eden until he knows until they know she will not be a pawn to push towards a sea of grey she will leave the apple trees to rot and burn the bridges she comes to whatever she may be:

night hag,
night monster,
night witch

will be better than a slave.

Rebecca Flieder is a Creative Writing major from New Hampshire whose works often focus on love and nature as they relate to the modern world. When not writing, she loves to wander the woods behind her home and pretend she's not the one that ate all the chocolate chip cookies.

Morning Hymn By Allison Gish

Stowie holds her grandfather's tobacco pipe.

She blows silvery wispy clouds into the sky

And makes plans to find Alaska, wanting the gentle love of cubs and bears.

I turn to the armoire and reach for my shawl, pulling the loose strings of fading lavender.

In the kitchen hangs the drying lavender

Which she sometimes lights in her pipe.

We sit by the open door and I pull my shawl Closer around my shoulders. She looks at the sky,

And she says that the clouds look like bears

And that today feels like Alaska.

I ask her if she knows that in Alaska

The sky is always a color like lavender, is always crying, for the weight is too much to bear.

She looks down and rolls the smooth old pipe

Between her fingers, and says that the sky

In Alaska is fine with its cloudy shawl.

I trace the cracks in the veneer with my shawl

Covering the tip of my finger like Alaska

Covers Stowie's thoughts. She says that the sky

Here is too big for her and a piece of lavender

Falls from its clothespin. She puts down the pipe

And she says she wishes she were a bear.

Her father walks into the kitchen, bearing

A basket. Re-hanging the lavender, my shawl

Falls and her father mumbles about a broken pipe.

He tells her not to go to Alaska

And in his basket lies something lavender

That he made small for her – it is the sky.

The armoire now holds the tiny sky.

Its finely cracking veneer bears the weight. I'm going to paint it lavender

I think, the same as the color of my shawl.

Stowie asks if I've ever been to Alaska

And then says something about pipe

Dreams. We watch the sky put on its starry shawl

As celestial bears dance somewhere above Alaska,

And with lavender paint we patch the broken pipe.

Allison Gish is a lover of all things natural hailing from the Rocky Mountains of Colorado. Her poetry and prose have appeared in Young Ravens Literary Review and Foxcroft Chimera Literature and Arts Magazine.

Unmaking By Annabel Chosy

The day you are taken out,

I am left at home to take a bath.

I turn the faucet and let the silver rush my palm, the nanny watching as the bathtub swells, and deepens.

I do not know of you yet, resting in the bloom of my mother, the waves spreading all around you:

so small.

I do not know of Dr. Kilburg, do not know of her sad mouth saying

No more heartbeat, no more, no more.

The water of the bathtub cups me like my mother cups herself when she comes home. She tries to smile at the pink child in the water, but the ache will remind her of will remind her.

Annabel Chosy is a high school student from Minneapolis, Minnesota. Her work has been published in The Blueshift Journal, Words Dance Publishing, Crashtest, and Stone Soup. She has also received recognition from the Scholastic Art & Writing Awards.

OCD and Heartbreaks By Linzy Rosen

Pills line my dresser

Like tallies in a prison cell

Plastered on the walls

Counting down the days until liberation.

I organize my pills into neat rows and columns

Just another one of my OCD perks

Except the only one that is cute is my cleanliness

You said

Apparently my disorder can be picked apart by Notes and Retweets-

You clicked the share button.

I shake up each bottle

A melancholy melody to accompany my broken-record thoughts

I wash my hands over and over in the fiery breath of scorching water at the thought of you

As red skin peels off

Like my clothes did that time in your bed

I guess I was too much to handle for more than one night.

My favorite pill is the one that looks like an atomic bomb

But whose name still sounds less foreign than yours when it rolls off my tongue.

My raw hands glide across the wondrous curves of the child lock cap I twist

Would you appreciate my body as much as this?

My hand fits better with the pill bottle than it did with yours.

Saliva embraces the pill as I gently slide it in the back of my throat

A euphoric reunion

How nice it is to be this close to something that will not push me away

That will not slam doors in my face or treat me like an experiment.

My fingers gingerly caress each tiny body

As I dump the remaining pills in my hand

They dance across the crosshatches of my palms and scars on my wrists Softer than any kiss I've ever received.

A smile warped with incredible pain and a feeling I cannot yet detect

Crawls across my face

When I realize that

This is the most intimate experience

I've ever had.

Linzy is a junior at Westfield High School in New Jersey. When she isn't reading or writing, she enjoys embracing her inner nerd by reciting over a hundred digits of pi to anyone willing (and even unwilling) to listen. She is an active member of her school's all female FIRST robotics team and a fierce environmental advocate. Armed with an ardent pen and the power of caffeine, she knows she can take on the world.

Pascal Eating a Dragonfly By James Corman

Pascal Eating a Dragonfly

James Corman is a rising sophomore at Harvard-Westlake high school. He is a Student Ambassador Blogger for his school and a student journalist for the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

Rue Malebranche By Katherine Sedlock-Reiner

Rue Malebranche

Katherine Sedlock-Reiner is a seventeen-year-old from Brooklyn, NY who loves frequenting Film Forum, translating Virginia Woolf into French, and finding faces among geometric patterns. Her art is inspired by writing and her writing by art. To see more of her work, visit kssrny.com

Juicy Colors By Leah Albaugh

Leah Albaugh is a student at Kennett High School who enjoys using her creativity to create art like this. Her style varies and she has a large range of mediums and techniques when it comes to making artwork. You can find her on Instagram at: leah.albaugh

Netted By Eva Park

Netted

Eva Park is a junior in the Los Angeles area. She loves to experiment with colors and different styles, but ultimately aims to convey the beauty and existentialism of nature. Her work has previously been recognized by Celebrating Art and Scholastic Art and Writing. In her free time, she enjoys reading, music, and volunteering at her local aquarium.

Untitled By Mason Pan

Untitled

My creative process in art often involves embracing risk. When I create pieces, there are often numerous variables beyond my control, from the unpredictability of mediums to the subjective interpretation of viewers. This is what I believe makes art profoundly dynamic and personal. By surrendering to the unknown and experimenting with new techniques or concepts, art pieces truly become unique and unable to be recreated.

“To me, art is about creating something meaningful that cannot be recreated. This philosophy is vividly reflected in this piece: the unpredictable interactions between mediums all contribute to its uniqueness.”- Mason Pan

Beachy Vibes By Grace Huang

Beach Vibes

My name is Grace Huang, and I am an artist whose favorite medium is watercolor/guache. One of my favorite pieces, "Beach Vibes," captures the serene and relaxing atmosphere of a beach getaway. Creating art has always been a source of happiness for me, and I love infusing my work with the peaceful, happy vibes that I hope others can feel when they view my paintings.

Lily By Ashley Lemons

Lily

Ashley Lemons is sixteen years old and attends Santa Barbara High School. Art has been an integral part of her life for as long as she can remember. She enjoys expressing herself through many creative mediums including drawing and painting, creative writing, and dance. She is inspired by nature and likes to experiment with mixed media, vibrant colors, and new techniques. In her free time she enjoys running, listening to music, and spending quality time with friends and family.
